4/18/2025 14:34:07	earcherd@gmail.com	Erin Archerd	670 Virginia Park	Yes	The developers have made some changes to the design, which I appreciate. I was okay with the larger number of units in the first plan, but it is nice that they moved the structure back from the street and cut down on the number of units. I like the new pediments above some of the doorways and the use of brick facing. The design still looks very modern, though. What is going on with the roof lines? Perhaps some gables on the roof? I'm not a huge fan of the houses the city employee was referencing in the block club meeting (you can see them on Euclid across from the Coop on Zillow). I think the current design of these town homes works better than those concrete block houses. Ideally, the new units would look more like the row houses around the corner at 3rd and Euclid, but I have no idea whether more wood or brick that would fit the style of materials currently found in the neighborhood would be economically feasible. Ultimately, I would like to see something like a cafe or coffee shop in our neighborhood, and if we allow some development in the neighborhood that increases density, then maybe the old hospital site will be developed and we will see some of those things. I'm thinking about something like Cafe Noir in the North End. While I don't love the current design, I could live with it and I think some new building would be good for the neighborhood in terms of attracting investment and increasing property values.
